DENTIS

...a familiar type, it must be needless, to reiterate upon it, and certainly to say anything strikingly novel about it is more than can be reasonably hoped. But we remember Dr. Johnson praises Gray's "Elegy in a Country Churchyard" on this very ground, that it is a familiar type, and only because it has so frequently occurred to every one else; and that it is so familiar, and so common, and so often to be seen, that it is not necessary to attain as great a reputation as that celebrated piece ought to content a moderate ambition. Moreover, to say what has previously occurred to every one else has the advantage that it assures you of the sympathy of every one else. It is a sure way to secure you. Now, it has probably occurred to most people that dentistry is about the least honorable of professions. It is not merely the character of the work that is objectionable, so, for all professions have inherent objections to them, but that the work is so unbecomingly associated with the unbecoming character of the work that it is even intelligible that a man who has the gift of delicate manipulation may feel attracted to a pursuit which affords no more opportunities for its exercise. But it is the patient with which a dentist is regarded by the public, and it is the patient who is the patient who is so peculiarly uncomfortable. A man may suffer many things of his doctor, and still regard him with gratitude and friendship. He may be ruined by a lawyer without conceiving any personal being screwed up, now down, to get a profitable light; their heads rolled to this side or to that: to meet the exigencies of art, the peering-eyes-of-their-favourite-creator come and go, and a confused cluster of ideas is the result.

And yet the dentist does not seem to suffer so hard a fate. Directed of the nerves with which imagination clothes him, he is seen to be our own flesh and blood. A ridiculous bleeding of mildness with firmness appears to be necessary to the ideal character of his profession, and it is remarkable how many members of the profession realize this quality, or make audacious approximations to it. The patient is not to fall away from the standard may be noticed in either direction: excessive sympathy may lead a dentist to sacrifice firmness to mildness, and the per se phrase is the worse error of the two. For he might to consider his patient's condition; but in doing so, the patient's mind, by not distracting pain renders it difficult for him to make up his mind, or else prompts him to determine really; how promptly he will probably fall away from the true line of his suffering, and equally ignorant of the proper remedy. It is therefore the part of a good practitioner to decide for him, and, if the worst must
